Responding to the crunch

Paper should be cited as:

The ‘credit crunch’ made its mark during the summer of 2007 following the collapse of the US sub-prime mortgage market – a global economic crisis that continues to reverberate throughout local and national economies. At the start of this year, head-spun by the crunch, Britain officially entered recession for the first time since 1991. In the final quarter of 2008, the economy shrank at its fastest pace for nearly 30 years. This economic spiral continued in the first quarter of 2009 when the economy contracted by a further 1.5%. Whilst more recently there has been flickers of hope and renewed optimism, there is no disguising the fact that in second quarter of 2009 the global community entered the deepest recession since World War II. As projections of economic contraction are feverishly debated, contested and refined on an ongoing basis, there is no disputing the dramatic surge in unemployment across the UK – with annual increases in job seeker allowance claimants (JSA) more than doubling in some (significant) pockets of the country.

As practitioners, policy-makers and politicians continue to operate in such fragile economic conditions, questions are being asked in relation to responding to the crunch and planning for the upturn. Indeed, a Government colleague contacted me at work the other day in a rush to gather some intelligence on ‘what local authorities are doing to respond to the recession’. Apparently, a Minister had been getting ‘quite vocal that he isn’t hearing about what local authorities are doing and so we’re compiling evidence of what we are doing to help people at the current time’. So in addition to supplying information about what I was doing on behalf of Durham County Council and the County Durham Economic Partnership, I decided to initiate a fact finding mission of what others are doing within the North East and further afield. A summary of ‘headline’ interventions supporting businesses and communities is contained in table 1.

It quickly became apparent that local authorities are tweaking services and support rather than responding to the crunch head-on. Some key themes emerged from the North East audit; highlighting that business support packages are high on the agenda of local authorities, as is local procurement, capital investment, apprenticeships, promotion, awareness raising and advice activities. With the exception of a few notable examples of local innovation, such as Essex County Council who are pioneering the ‘Bank of Essex’ and Transition Town in Lambeth circulating the ‘Brixton Pound’, responses, to date at least, by local authorities have tended to focus on things that they did before, but are perhaps doing it a little better now or with a bit more urgency and impetus. This is to be commended – the majority of local authorities are intervening in areas (both spatially and sectorally) which they ‘know’ they can deliver results.

On the whole, local authorities have been pragmatic in responding to the crunch: doing what they can and working in partnership with other organisations, such as Regional Development Agencies and Business Link. Yet, with public sector budgets expected to be significantly squeezed over the next decade, with both Labour and the Conservatives announcing that cuts will have to be made, when should we expect an economic recovery and how can we plan for it? Will QUANGO’s, such as the Regional Development Agencies, be around under a Conservative-led State? And if not, what economic tools and resources will local authorities be offered beyond a duty to produce an Economic Assessment? Indeed, what use is knowledge of local economic needs and opportunities if the tools and resources are not also in place to deliver interventions?
